

Hello, again. In the music review section of my website you will see that the lower down an article is on my page, the more extreme it is. For example, I started out with 'new' reviews, then I moved onto 'xtra new', then 'ultra new'. That was harmless, as was the 'power of Thor new'. What wasn't harmless however, was me saying that my power that I simply called 'power of Simon new' is more powerful and better than that of the Norse God mentioned. Me saying my power was better than type 4 civilisations probably won't offend any religious people, but if there are aliens out there browsing my site, they may think I've been arrogant. 'But how can aliens check out your site?' Well, that's what makes type 4 civilisations so impressive, isn't it? So yeah, sorry to vikings and sorry to aliens. You know who I'm really sorry to? Viking aliens. They sound like creatures you really don't want to upset. Technologically advanced, yet brutal. I might as well find the head of the armed forces, tell him he's less than me and give him the finger. Just for the sake of naming a new music review? Try explaining that to someone you've already angered.

Taking things further, is Simon new REALLY newer than ultra new? Because when I hear the phrase 'ultra new' I think of advanced technology like amazing video games and spaceships, whereas newness for me is finding the best way of annoying the same person (poor Dan) over and over again whilst trying to keep things fresh. It's an obnoxious kind of originality that I admit shouldn't be as celebrated as much as a man landing on the moon, for example. It's not big, it's not clever and to be clear, it's most definitely not better than Neil Armstrong. Or.... is it? I'm just saying, if I was seriously risking my life going into space and landing on a new world to collect some of its materials, at very least I'd be hoping to get hold of some gold and diamonds, etc. What did Neil Armstrong and Buzz Aldrin collect on their mission? Materials made of hydrogen, oxygen, silicon, iron, magnesium, calcium, aluminium, manganese and titanium. Titanium is pretty cool I suppose, but if I collected the other materials and finally found out what they were made of, I'd just be like 'Oh for (expletive's) sake!'

I also said my later reviews are beyond, beyond possible. Plain beyond possible is one thing, but double beyond? Needless to say, it's not really possible, is it? I'm sorry for making such a blatant lie for the sake of views. Between you and me, and I'm not sure if you've noticed this, but to be brutally honest, 95% of the time I actually have no real clue what I'm talking about in such reviews, so I have to make exaggerated claims in order to boost my self esteem a little. Not knowing enough is bad enough for most people, but I've actually studied music at university and when I see others play a simple chord progression that obeys all the musical laws, such as no parallel 5ths and all that stuff, I react with shame and rage. So yeah, to hide such feelings I have to claim to be more powerful than God. It's not on. I'm not joking by the way. I know how to play C, F and G on a guitar, that's easy. How Mozart would play it on the other hand? I don't really know.

Finally, I said the power of me is more powerful than the state of being 'ridiculously new'. However, I won't apologise for that as my behaviour has often been described as ridiculous. More than ridiculous, even. If you didn't know, it's kind of a thing in the mental health community (at least it is for me) where the more mentally ill you are, the more you win. It should be pointed out there's a difference to being mental and psychopathic, I'm certainly not saying be as EVIL as possible that's terrible, but if you hear voices more than your fellow patient, it's understood that you're the victor and if you share a room with the person, you get the top bunk or whatever. What I'm trying to say is, if you really want something, you'll likely get it in the end, and as explained I want to be as ridiculous as possible so I'm superior to everyone in my home at very least, and praise the lord (who isn't me!) that's what I got. Some people won't understand that, but there are some people I don't understand. I know he's a fictional character, but I couldn't be Bilbo Baggins. The thought of adventure SOUNDS good, but in practice? Too difficult, but I do beat him in other ways, as explained. And... bye!